There are laws on the Tennesse statute books against railroad discrimination that can and ought to be enforced, but an expensive and incompetent commission to interfere with the intricate problem of milroad rates could serve uo purpose but to retard enterprise and do general injury beth the people and the railroads. Railroad legislation in Tennesses should take a rest at this point.

BLAINE'S MALIGNITY.

Since Blaine's defeat for the Presi dency he has resumed work on the second volume of his so-called history. As might have been expected of a nature so malignant, the book will bear traces of the soreness he feels over his failure to catch the presidential banble and make a special exhibit of his spite and spleen towards the South. In some of the extracts which the publishers of the forthcoming volume have given to the press, this spirit of "resentment, reprisal and revenge" is very evident. In speaking of Andrew Johnson, he takes occasion to throw in the following:

the Northern States, was frequently shown in the South, where it had long been domesticated with all its Corsican ferocity. It had raged in many instances to the extermination of families, and in many localities to the destruction of peace and the utter defiparalyzing the administration of justice in whole counties. Often seeking and waging open combat with ferocious courage, it did not hesitate at secret murder, at way-laying on lonely roads explanation of their votes for the with superior numbers, and it some-times went so far as to torture an un-happy victim before the final death-

Mr. Blaine must have obtained the "facts" on which this was founded from the account of the celebrated Grangerford and Shepherdson feud related in Mark Twain's "Huckleberry Finn. Real Southern life at no period in the history of the country would by any means justify such a statement. He brings this in to account for the alleged apprehension of the Northern people that Andrew Johnson, as President, would exercise a vindictive spirit towards the ex-rebels. Mr. Johnson's whole life, from the time he was a street urchin in Raleigh, N. C., till he tilled the Presidential chair, might be searched in vain for any experiences like the above. Besides that, Southern men in public positions since the foundation of the republic had shown as broad a statesmanship and patriotism as those from any other section. Surely such base slanders will eventually act as a boomerang on those who give them utterance.

THE Charleston News and Courier says the newly appointed Minister to Mexico "belongs assuredly to the pleiappointment has probably aroused more unfavorable comment and objection than any yet made by the President. It is said to greatly dis please the Mexicans themselves, and the American residents of Mexico. Considering the intimate commercial relations that have sprung up between the United States and her southern neighbor, it would seem that the Minister to that country should be less of the typical diplomat and more of the active business man than is embodied in the person of General Jackson, of
